RAMPANT ATHEISM.

There is a subject that requires handling. The atheists of the country do not seem content themselves with holding their opinions locked in the closet of ignorance. They have become offensively social, to sectional and municipal meetings. They boldly demand government appointments. If they did this modestly we would not complain; but some of them do not. They take their obnoxious sentiments into the schools and churches. One moment they shock all Christendom by ridiculing the sacred mysteries of the Christian religion, and the very next moment they ask for an office in the gift of the Christian people. Is it not high time that the Christian people of this country do their duty to their children, to their country and to their God? Is it not high time that they should say to these men, "We do not want your services in the management of our schools, nor in the government of our country. We want men who believe in God and the Bible, and who will not insult the religious sentiments of the majority of the people." This has been done by this and that municipality, and why should not the same be done by the Christian people of this country? Is it not high time that the Christian people of this country should use their influence with their representatives in the Local Legislature and in the Dominion Parliament to have the Christian religion taught in the schools of this country? Is it not the duty of Christian men to

We are sitting alone in the evening,
Almost, while dark shadows fall,
And the cool, tender breeze comes creeping
And whispers around in call all.

While it sings me and hushes the children
And lulls them to sleep in the night.

And low is the song of the waters,
But list to the night-bird's sweet song.

CHAPTER VI.

UNEXPECTANT ARRIVAL.

I travelled in hot haste, or fast as steam would beat me, to Geneva; where I at once began my inquiries as to the whereabout of Dr. Conrad. I had hoped that finding him would not be so difficult a task. His words had given me the impression that he promised in the town. If so, many people must know him. But he had visited me at 1 o'clock in the morning. Few servants days I learned high and low, inquired every where; but not a soul could I find who knew the name. I was on every door to door in the place; one and all professed entire ignorance of such a colleague. At last I felt certain that the name he had given me was a fictitious one, or that Geneva was not his abode. Moreover chance a doctor may be, he is sure to be known by some of his patients, and I had not that name town. I decided to go to Turin, and by my host there.

It was on the eve of my intended departure. I was sitting absent, musing over it, and at heart and trying to persuade myself that I should fare better in Turin, when I noticed a man lounging along the opposite side of the street. He was a man I had not seemed familiar to me, I crossed the road to see him to better advantage. Being satisfied in the first instance that I had not previously the appearance of an ordinary Swiss traveller—no search on that I believed I must be mistaken. But I was right, after all. In a few minutes I recognized him the moment I drew near. He was the man with whom Pauline had engaged in a words was one with San Giovanni—the man who had remonstrated with us for our supposed admiration of Pauline—the man who had walked away arm in arm with Conrad.

The chance was too good a one to be lost. He would at least know where the doctor was to be found. I tracked the memory for those words that my intuitive sense told me would not connect me with the unpleasant passage which occurred when I had last heard them. Whether I succeeded in erasing my had requested him to favor me with a few moments' conversation.

I spoke in English. He gave me a quick, penetrating glance, then suddenly bridging my salutation, professed, in the same language, his desire to place himself at my service.

"I am trying to ascertain the address of a gentleman of the name of Conrad," I began. "I believe, I have been told, I should find you will be able to assist me."

He laughed. "I will if I can—but being Swiss myself as English-born, and having very few people, I fear I can be of little help to you."

"I am anxious to find a doctor named Conrad."

The start he gave as he heard my words, the look, almost of apprehension, he cast on me, showed me that he recognized the name. He seemed for the moment bewildered.

"I cannot remember the name. I am sorry to say I am unable to help you."

"But," I said, in Italian, "I have seen you in his company."

He replied promptly. "I know no man of the name. Good morning."

He raised his hat and strode away.

I was not going to lose him like that. I questioned and came up with him.

I must beg of you to tell me where I can find him. I must see him upon an important matter. It is no use denying that he is a friend of yours."

He hesitated, then halted. "You are strangely importunate, sir. Perhaps you will tell me your reason for your interest that the man you met in my friend?"

"I saw you arm-in-arm with him."

"Was, my I ask?"

"Signor—last spring. Outside San Giovanni."

He looked at me attentively. "Yes, I remember your face now. You are one of those young men who have had a lady, and whom I swore to smash—"

"He insult was meant, but even had it been so, it might be passed over now."

"No indeed! I have killed a man for less than your friend said to me!"

"Please remember I said nothing. But that matters little. It is on behalf of his friend, Pauline, that I wish to see Dr. Conrad."

A look of utter amazement spread over his face. "What have you to do with his name?" he asked roughly.

"That is no business and mine. Now tell me where I can find him."

"What is your name?" he asked sternly.

"Gilbert Vaughan."

"What are you?"

"An English gentleman," I replied curt.

He remained thoughtful for a few seconds. "I can take you to Conrad," he said, "but first I must know what you want with him, and why you mention Pauline's name. If you refuse, I will not the place to talk in—let us go elsewhere."

I led him to my host's in a room where we could talk at our ease.

"Now, Mr. Vaughan," he said, "answer my question, and I may see my way to helping you. What has Pauline Marsh to do with the name Conrad?"

"She is my wife—that is all."

He sprang to his feet—a fierce Italian oath blazed from his lips. His face was white with rage.

"Your wife!" he shouted. "You lie—I say you lie!"

I rose, furious on himself, but more excited.

"I told you, sir, that I was an English gentleman. Either you will apologize for your words or I will look you out of the room."

He struggled with his passion and curbed it. "I apologize," he said. "I was wrong. Does Conrad know it?" he asked sharply.

"Certainly; he was present when we were married."

His passion once more seemed upon the point of mastering him. "Traditore!" I heard him whisper fiercely to himself. "Ingannatore!" Then he turned to me in Italian and said fearlessly.

"If so, I have nothing more to do save to congratulate you, Mr. Vaughan. Your fortune is indeed enviable. Your wife is beautiful, and of excellent parts. You will find her a charming companion."

I would have given much to know why the mention of my marriage should have cast him into such a storm of rage, but I would have given more to have been able to fell my throat of looking him out. The intonation of his last words told me that Pauline's state of mind was well known to him. I could scarcely keep my hands off the fellow; but I was compelled to restrain my anger, as without his aid I could not find Conrad.

"Thank you," I said quietly, "now perhaps you will give me the information I want."

"I am sorry not a very devoted bridegroom, Mr. Vaughan," said the fellow mockingly. "If Conrad was at your wedding it could only have occurred a few days ago. It was a hasty ceremony, I suppose, which hurried you from the side of your bride."

"Then I know it must visit a few days. Conrad is still in Geneva. But I have no reason to think he may be here in another week's time. I shall see him, and tell him that you have been."

"Let me hasten always to find him, and I will call upon him. I must speak with him."

"I imagine that will be on the doctor chooses. I can only make known your wishes to him."

He bowed and left me. I felt that even now my visit was fruitful; whether I should succeed in obtaining the interview with the mysterious doctor. It depended entirely whether he chose to grant it. He might not be in Geneva, and go away again without my being any the wiser, unless his friend or Conrad sent me some communication.

I idled away the time, and when hours so I was in Conrad and made up his mind to keep out of my way. But it was not so. A letter came the next morning. It contained a few lines only.

"You wish to see me. A carriage will call for you at 11 o'clock. M. C."

At 11 o'clock an ordinary hired carriage drove up to the door. The driver inquired for Mr. Vaughan. I stepped in without a word, and was driven to a small house in the suburbs. It being quite impossible a man I feared the door opened at a table covered with newspapers and letters. His face, and shaking my hand hugged me to his heart.

"You have come to Geneva to see me, I hear, Mr Vaughan?"

"I have," I replied, "to ask you some questions concerning my wife."

"I will answer all I can—but there are many I shall doubtless refuse to reply to. You are married, my friend, I hear?"

"Yes, but why did you not make me aware of my wife's peculiar mental condition?"

"You had seen her yourself several times. Her state was the same as when she first proved so attractive to you. I am not aware that I should have informed you of it."

"Why not have told me everything? Then I could have blamed no one."

"I had no many reasons, Mr. Vaughan. Pauline was a great responsibility on my shoulders. A great expense, for I am a poor man. And, after all, is the matter so serious? Pauline is a good wife, I am assistable. She will make you a loving wife."

"You wished to get rid of her, in fact."

"Decidedly that altogether. There are circumstances—I cannot explain them—which made me glad to money her to an Englishman and to quit Geneva."

Without thinking what that man's feelings might be on finding the woman he loved loath better than a child—

I took a dignified shrewd my feeling very plainly. Conrad took very little notice of my warmth. He remained perfectly calm.

"There is another point to be considered, Pauline's case is, in my opinion, far from being hopeless. Indeed, I have always looked upon marriage as greatly adding to the chances of her recovery. If her mind is a certain extent is wanting, I believe that, little by little, it may be built up again. Or it may return at suddenly as it left her."

My heart leaped at his words of hope. Greatly as I feel I had been treated, feel that I had been made for the man's selfish ends, I was willing to accept the situation absorbingly if I had any hope held out to me.

"Will you give me all the particulars of my poor wife's case?" I suddenly she had got always been like this."

"Certainly not. How soon is most pain. Some years ago she received a great shock—sustained a sudden loss. The effect was to entirely blot out the past from her mind. The poor from her bed after some months' illness, with her memory completely gone. Her mind was strangely to her. Her mind might, as you say, have been the mind of a child. But a child's mind grows, and, if treated properly, so will hers."

"What was the name of her illness—what shock?"

"That is one of the questions I cannot answer."

"But I have a right to know."

"You have a right to ask, and I have a right to refuse to speak."

"Tell me of her family—her relatives."

"She has no relatives, save myself."

I asked other questions, but could get no answers worth recording. I should return to England next month other than I left it. But should a child's mind grows, and, if treated properly, so will hers."

QUICKLY AVENGED.

J. R. Garry, a White-Haired Sinner of 74, and Jane Ward, a Hardened Reprobate of 60, Lynched—The Couple Accused of an Atrocious Double Murder.

A Centre, Ala., despatch says: At 1 o'clock Wednesday morning the Cherokee County Jail, located in this town, was surrounded by thirty masked men in handkerchief, and all heavily armed. The horsemen were drawn up in double column. One column faced the jail and the other the approaches. Twelve men then dismounted and, on riding to the door of the jail, called on the Sheriff to advance from his room, whither he had retired and furnished himself for an assault, and surrender J. R. Dorsey and Miss Jane Ward. The Sheriff refused. The doors were at once battered down, and the men in an instant were in the lower corridor, the noise to which could carry way before well directed blows. The noise of the furious assault awakened the inmates of the jail, and they all hurriedly dressed, and a negro, who is held for theft, directed the mob to the cells of Dorsey and Miss Ward. The mob then descended the Sheriff's keys to the cells, and he surrendered them. One brawny man volunteered to unlock the door and pulled Dorsey out into the corridor. He begged piteously for his life, and then gave a way to more fell at the feet of the mob, and, lifting his hands, prayed fervently for divine relief. He was then led forward and his hand, while hair flowing in the soft breeze, and his pinkish the sweetness of the disgraceful scene. Sent up his prayer to any of reference that was made published to intend two of the executioners to plead to his behalf. But the other two were inexorable. Dorsey was then led forward, and Miss Ward was hauled less rudely taken, was equally patient. She had passed her fifth year in jail. The female was not a woman of rare beauty. Her face and bearing had been well preserved. She presented a favorable appearance. When she was brought out to meet her fate. She had her countenance was of sheet durable. Her strength gave way, and with a last asserting of innocence she fainted and fell heavily upon the stone floor of her cell. One of the men caught her in his arms, and swinging her body across his shoulder bore her out of the jail, followed by Dorsey and his escort. The mob then took a side road and marching down to a ravine on the banks of the Cedar River, they attached the rope to a limb that overhung the water. A rock over the pinned waters beneath. The rope was so adjusted that it would not slip and catch the neck. Dorsey's hands were hastily adjusted at both ends, and were slipped over the heads of the aged couple. The rope was drawn and a moment later the bodies were suspended from the limb, and dangled until life had become extinct. Then the swaying ceased and the lifeless bodies being taken down by the negro, when the coroner cut them down. As soon as the bodies were shoved off the brink the vigilantes mounted their rods at a gallop to the plan where they assembled, and then, after holding a hurried conference, they unceremoniously soon disappeared. The crime for which the aged couple gave their lives was one of the most atrocious ever perpetrated in the South. On the night of Monday 5th inst. Mrs. Davis was sitting in her parlor entertaining a female friend, a neighbor who had called to see her husband. He was just after twilight when a loud voice was heard calling for Mrs. Davis, who responded. Her appearance at the threshold was instantly followed by the report of a shot, and with a piercing scream she fell dead, bleeding from the wounds of a load of shot discharged which severed a breast. Some and scattered fragments of her vital organs upon the wall. On the hearing the report of the gun and the woman's screams Jones hastened to the door only to have the top of his head blown off by a charge from his gun, fell dead instantly. The assailants on seen disappeared. Before the life's blood of the unfortunate lady had ceased flowing the [illegible] had fallen victims to the fiendish designs of Dorsey and Miss Ward, who were sacrificed at the opposite of the dead by the which by persons quite other. Circumstances seemed to point to Dorsey and Miss Ward as the perpetrators of the horrible deed, and they were immediately arrested. A lynching would have at once ensued but for the sheriff secured the prisoners and conveyed them in the jail at Alpine, Ga. That night they were spirited away, and it was not until then that the full extent of their schemes was detected. The events of Monday night at once followed. Dorsey was jealous of Mrs. Davis, who was his niece, and that in the only motive that can be ascribed for the crime. Miss Jane Ward was a spinster of 50 years. Prior to the war she was a man of wealth, but by the indifferent aetheri her reputation, and from that time she has lived secluded from society. She is a native of Georgia, and recently became attached to Dorsey. She was considered an accessory to the killing.

A PECULIAR CASE.

A Woman Bleeds to Death Within Reach of Help at Hope, Arkansas.

A Brookville despatch says: A peculiar case in medical practice, and as sad as peculiar, occurred here about half past 8 on Wednesday afternoon. Dr. W. H. Moore was summoned, at the hour mentioned, to visit the home of a mechanic named McKinney, on Water street, where he found a lady in agony. A woman about 30 years of age, apparently dead in a chair. In order to reach her side the physician had to step in a pool of blood. A pool of blood three feet wide, about twelve feet in length, and of sufficient depth to thoroughly saturate his boots nearly half way to the instep. As quickly as possible the unfortunate woman was helped to a couch near at hand, where restoratives were applied in the hope of bringing to consciousness, but only for a short time, death ending her sufferings in about half an hour after the physician arrived. The cause of death was the bursting of a varicose vein about midway between the knee and ankle of the left leg. Through fright or weakness the poor woman died nothing to save herself, and had bled to death within twenty feet of neighbors and friends. A pool of deep blood about her body had flowed into the crimson pool on the floor. The physician reports the case as an unusual one.

TOO WEAK TO LIVE.

New York Journal: "Why is this butter like fascinators?" asked the young man at the foot of the table. Everybody except the landlady who chose to say something complimentary to the cook, and the founder of the misunderstood, who fought a claim in Sunday School, gracefully responded.

"Because it was shown off to hair after it fell into the hands of the Philistines."

As the joke was so weak as to be a flop there were no groans for hilarity.

AN UNCOMING FATHER.

A boy of girls soon looking at a bridal trousseau.

"How exquisite!" "How lovely!" How supremely sweet!" "Oh, all summer, over the exclusive hotel resorts.

"You ought to be very happy, Clara," said one of the girls to the bride elect.

"I suppose I ought," said Clara, disconsolately, "but papa won't bring a newspaper reporter to look at them."

Chorus—What a shame!

The editor of The Boston Journal of Chemistry has learned by observation that the ant is an active and efficient destroyer of the cucker worm. The little creatures would seize the worms which were feeding upon the tree and no sign from a man those in their powerful grip in their nest in the ground.

Northwest Notes.

Manitoba has entered upon the last month year of its existence.

Arrivals from the Rockies on Saturday report four feet of snow there.

R. H. Bradrick, ex-editor of the Kaleidoscope of Lake, has arrived in Winnipeg and will address the people of Winnipeg on the 20th inst.

In the first week of October ripe wild strawberries were found by the two little sons of Rev. G. H. Hooper in the township of Richmond—a very good proof of the mildness of the fall.

A farewell banquet was given to Dr. R. P. Bell at the Grand Union Hotel, Winnipeg, on Saturday evening by a large number of his personal friends. Dr. Bell leaves the city, not from choice, but necessity, the dubious health of Mr. Bell rendering it necessary in the meantime, at least, that a change of climate be secured.

The Dauphin Herald says: The Dauphin Lumber Co. has shipped 1,000,000 feet of lumber to the Northwest Territories this season, and has orders for 1,000,000 more. The company has a large force of men employed at the mill, and will be kept busy for some time to come.

The Chinese had 41 vessels, 10,000 troops, two of which were armed with one gun each, and the rest with Vavasseurs, 54 inch B.L.R., and Krupp's 12 pounder breechloading guns. These vessels were all armoured composite or wooden ships, with the exception of French gunboats, which were 214 Chinese, 60 (excluding two junks) Wright's of broadside, French, 7,000 pounds; Chinese, 4,000 pounds. Men, French, 2,000; Chinese, 12,000. Loss, not one of the French ships were in an excellent state of discipline and condition, while the Chinese were more or less undisciplined, which caused a feeling of lassitude and despondency. Had not the awe cast in the hour by the French, and that could, and, with the Chinese admiral, inched down on the fight from the 15 gilted peak around and six miles distant; Middle the forces Admiral, the Chinese had an army of 15,000 boarding them.

This was the state of affairs when, on August 22nd, the French admiral, having expired, Admiral Courbet warned all ships of the coming engagement.

The 23rd of August was a beautiful day, with a slight breeze blowing from the northeast, and as soon the French could be seen standing to their guns, apparently ready for action, which was not long delayed coming up the river, and soon the Chinese could be made out. It was the Triumph.

At 1.56 a red flag went fluttering up beside the Volta's masthead, a sharp bang, and then another, and the Chinese engagement had begun. Shortly after 2 o'clock the rolling thunder of the guns from the Triumph, and

ECHOES FROM THE MICE.

For THE ECHO by C. S.

One evening late, in bleak October,
Two mice by some great care made sober
Made by appetizement to revive
Their winter prospects through and through.
On in a neighboring grist mill found
Food to fit taste, both whole and ground,
'Tis all of food (reason) many a bill,
He came from Hazeldenbushe mill.
Said one, "the winter's drawing near,
With wants in store for us I fear:
The farmers, pellets though they are
Have had their patience tried too far,
With dingy flour from steam bright wheat.
They say the miller is a cheat.
Short weight they say is now the rule;
Perhaps they never went to school.
But whether grangers are all fools,
Or merely made the millers' tools,
'Tis all the same to us, you know,
Since any crop but wheat they grow."
The other spoke in hopeful strain—
"There's never loss without some gain.
I heard by chance the other day
Of just the place for me to stay.
I think within the village store
We'll find good flour and something more.
And hopeful there they went to roost.
The store with many a frisk and squeak.
Twixt you and me these aunts two mice
By giving way to avarice
Had been some of their own trouble
And talk of miller's dasting double.
And now to make my object clear
There ought to be a moral here;
But I'll conclude my silly rhyme
And give you that some other time.

[The writer of the above says it was suggested by the fact that our farmers are growing up growing wheat and blame the millers for it.]

BROADSIDE SCENERY.

I'm crossing the 2nd concession line north to Mr. Croft's, you will find yourself on the premises of Mr. Jacob Pickett. His is one of the best cultivated farms in the county. Mr. Pickett is one of the very first settlers in the township of Minden, as we think there was only two or three men who had made an attempt at settlement before him. Here he commenced to fell the forest and by industry and good management, he has made a home for himself and family in their old days worthy of praise from all who look upon it. His residence and outbuildings are grand. His flocks and herds are large. Then on the corner of Lot 26, Con. 2, stands the school house of section No. 5, Minden. This building needs no description, as the location and the good judgment of the trustees in their choices of sites, is a model one, is admired by everybody. Miss Labb, has at present charge of this school, in one of the best teaching fields in the county, and is labouring hard to raise the young people with knowledge that when they grow old will not be ashamed to own them. On going east from the school house you come to the residence of Mr. John Hill. This gentleman, too, has a magnificent residence, surrounded by grand scenery of green trees and a thriving young orchard. Still further going up the hill you come to the residence of Mr. Alexander Anderson, where you can see his broad acres on both sides of the line, under the best of cultivation. His dwelling is surrounded by good bearing fruit trees and lots of olive branches.

Now Mr. Ajax, take your case;
Sit down and read and chat too,
But if you want real knowledge
Be sure to read the Echo.

We now pass on to the residence of Mr. Richard Bonny, which only wants to be seen to be admired. Mr. B. is a man who looks after the dollars and cents. Therefore his fields and herds are large upon the mountain slopes. Then there is Mr. Robert Burke and Mr. John Anderson, whose farms are also surrounded by grand scenery, but, last not least, on the 2nd Con. line of Lot [illegible] is the farm of D. Macdonald, Esq. Minding is surrounded by beautiful shade trees and [illegible]. As Mr. Macdonald is working it will be all that can be desired.

SCRIBBLEFIDGET.

KUSHOG MILLS—SAWYER'S NARROWS.

While the writer saw fit at your correspondents at Ingoldsby and South Lake had followed in his lines, I am excluded. Imitation is the finest form that flattery can take. So on hope a description of your respective neighbourhoods is a much better way of filling up the columns of a newspaper than the style adopted by many periodicals with much larger pretensions than THE ECHO. How often do such announcements as the following pass for local news:—"Miss Jones, after a sojourn of six months at Lindsay has once more returned to the shelter of the paternal roof," or "Mrs. Brown has escaped the vacation in putting a new sash into her husband's go-to-meeting pants." For my part I would have been well pleased if your South Lake correspondent had enlarged on the topographical history of his exceedingly delightful neighbourhood. He might have described the fine low-lying tracts of level land that surround South Lake. He might explain, as he best knows how, why the snakes are all so large and behemoth as form and why the "water vessels" set there are all web-footed. Has the swampy state of the land anything to do with it? Many a time and oft have I seen that lordly-haired individual in hand of rustic wheelbarrow the fish caught in hand of rustic wheelbarrow to his mate of place. The natural history of South Lake reminds me very much of the "land of reeds." However, just a digression, let us return to the placid waters of Lake Kushog, to the aristocratic retreat of Sawyer's Narrows to the wondrous activity of Kushog mills, and to the kind to the genial, also to the affectionate hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. James Nesbitt, Sawyer's Narrows! Can you, Mr. Editor, look back through the dim vista of many happy years on some long spot that is the most blissful memory of your age? Then sympathize with me, sir, when I exclaim, "Thou art lovely as of old, oh wild Kushog! Wilt though fourth Lake should boast of beauty? Ingoldsby's post office? What though Moore's Falls should become a lock, and Minden might become a desk, and thither might newries flock? What is that to them? Thou art still lovely as of old! But still, if the reader wishes for fruit fields and pastures new, we just jump on to the "Lily of the Lake," a fine and handsome steamer commanded by Commodore Walker. We will only detain him a moment while Mr. Heaney slowly revolves the span of his new swing bridge, and the "Lily" steadily steams her way into Sawyer's Narrows—and high on the hill stands the town of the home of the Blairs—Blairhampton. Go on sir. Visit those genial farmers—you will find a hearty welcome, but I go no further. I'll tell you a secret—(Don't you publish this)—Down there at the Narrows lives a maiden whom all nature calls the flower of Kushog.

"A violet, by a mossy stone,
Half hidden to the eye,
Bright as a star when only one
Is shining in the sky."

VIOLET.

—The cedar timber is now and the small boy is gutting the kinks out of kite.

—Economy may be wealth, but it is not always a good thing to draw sight drafts on.

—Mayor Smith, of Milton, has appointed clerk of the town in place of T. F. Jones, deceased, and has resigned the mayoralty to fill his new position.
